Timely Opportunities

Should You File a Business Interruption Claim for COVID-19 Losses?

Small businesses have lost billions of dollars during the novel coronavirus (COVID-19) pandemic. Those that had the foresight to purchase business interruption insurance to protect themselves from a disaster-related closing may want to file a claim as soon as possible. Unfortunately, it's likely that those claims will be denied — at least until the courts and lawmakers can address the issue. In the meantime, your business can take certain proactive measures to establish its rights as the legal landscape evolves.

Operating Your Business

Working from Home ... or Moving to an Office

It's tempting when you open a new business to save money by working from a home office. And for some people and some enterprises, it's a solution that works long-term. But not everyone can or should work from home, and not every house or neighborhood is the right location for a business. Before you hang your company shingle up under your kids' basketball hoop, consider these points.

Family Strategies

Begin to Think About Estate Planning

Estate planning is about a lot more than giving away financial assets. Many of the decisions that need to be addressed could affect you and your family during your lifetime. What would happen, for example, if you were no longer able to make your own decisions? Are family members depending on you to make proper arrangements for them in case you cannot be there? Read on for a rundown of issues you should consider while there is still time.
